The school that grows its own lunch

Three years ago, the playground of Greenhill Secondary School, in the suburbs of Westbury, was a square of grey concrete where nobody wanted to spend their breaks. Today it is covered with wooden boxes full of tomatoes, lettuces, strawberries and herbs. The transformation began when a biology teacher, Elena Marsh, asked the head teacher for permission to plant a few vegetables with her students as a science experiment. “I only wanted to show them how a seed becomes a plant,” she remembers. “I never imagined it would change the whole school.”

The experiment grew quickly. Students from every year group now spend one hour a week in the garden, and the oldest ones are responsible for watering during the holidays. Every Saturday morning, a group of volunteers takes the vegetables to the neighbourhood market, where they sell them from a small stall. The money is not used for the garden itself, which is paid for by the school, but to buy books and sports equipment. Last year the stall earned almost four thousand pounds.

The project has had its critics. Some parents complained that their children were spending time digging instead of preparing for their exams, and a few neighbours were worried about the smell of the compost. However, the results have surprised everyone. Science marks have improved, and teachers say that students who used to be difficult in class are calmer and more cooperative after an hour outside. “Working with your hands teaches you patience,” Elena says. “You cannot shout at a tomato to make it grow faster.”

Perhaps the most unexpected change has been in what the students eat. Before the garden, most of them bought crisps and chocolate at the school shop. Now many bring salads from home, and the canteen uses the school’s own vegetables twice a week. Several students have started small gardens on their balconies, and one of them, sixteen-year-old Leo Barrett, has decided to study agriculture at university. “I used to think vegetables came from the supermarket,” he admits. “Now I know how much work there is behind a single carrot.”
